

Indiana's no call law is a good one. I have been harassed every day by telemarketers. I recently signed up on the no call list and am looking forward to not receiving the harassing phone calls when the next list takes affect. Instead of interfering with the current law in Indiana, why not enact a policy that lets the people receiving the unwanted phone calls the right to bill the telemarketers for the time use harassing people that don't want to be harassed. I pay dearly for my telephone service and I expect my privacy to be observed. The current Indiana law guarantees me this privacy. I don't appreciate the FCC trying to suppress this right of privacy in my own residence. Everyone I know who are on the no call list have made comments on how nice it is not to be annoyed by constant unwanted phone calls. I realize there are services to screen calls, but instead of tampering with the Indiana law, maybe you should be asking the phone companies why they sell the names of the subscribers to telemarketers and then charge the subscribers for a service to block the telemarketers. It seems to me your time would be better spent looking out for the people you serve than hampering the laws that protect them.
